One of the picturesque figures appearing in Marion Harland's autobiography is Major James Morton, who served throughout the Revolution and was known in the army as 'Old Solid Column,' says Harper's Weekly. He was an old man, of course, when Marion Harland knew him—a pitlable wreck'of the once stout-hearted and stout-bodied warrior. But he still had definite lders on some subjects and was doughty in their defense. Once when an acquaintance casually made mention in his presence of a trip up the Hudson to West Point, the veteran raised himself as if he had been shaken the Hudson to West Point, the veteran raised himself as if he had been shaken by the shoulder. "That is not true," he said doggedly. "But, Major," returned the surprised narrator, "I did go. There is a regular line of steamers up the river." The old warhorse regred his head and beat the floor with an angry heel. "I say it is not true! It could not be true! General Washington had a big chain stretched across the river after Arnold tried to sell West Point, so that no vessel could get to the fort. And, sir," bringing his cane down upon the hearth with a resounding thump, "there is not that man upon earth who would dare take down that chain. Why, sir, General Washington put it there!"
